Swedish Col. Stig Wennerstrom said he earned $2000 on errands for the Central Intelligence Agency while he was in Washington spying for the Russians.

Now serving a life term in Sweden for his pro-Soviet espionage, Wennerstrom was enlisted by the CIA to spirit packages out of the Soviet Embassy here, according to an article in the current issue of the New Yorker magazine. He said he did it twice and was paid $1000 a trip, the article states. The account seems largely based on Swedish interrogation records.

Wennerstrom served as Sweden's air attache here from 1952 to 1957. He had already been enlisted by Soviet intelligence agents; but before that, Wennerstrom had carried out espionage assignments for the United States as Swedish air attache in Moscow.

After his arrival in Washington, Wennerstrom told his interrogators, he ran into a CIA man at a Pentagon lunch functions regularly and keep "My reaction was one of relief because it was not as I feared—that they had found exchange of passwords . . ." the New Yorker article states.

The small packages he picked up from the contact were to be passed onto a CIA agent later.

In Washington, Wennerstrom's tips to hard-working spies would include cultivating the ladies and paying your parking tickets.

Wennerstrom also kept money handy for "bribing people in defense plants." He found it "a simple matter to buy information," the article relates. He told his interrogators he paid $1000 for information from unnamed contacts in the electronics industry and was also successful in another bribery.

Wennerstrom was arrested in Sweden in 1963 and tried the next year.

While here, he was highly successful in getting detailed plans of the Bomarc and HM-55 missiles, among other information, the article states.

He returned to Sweden "with an American decoration, the Order of the Legion of Merit, which had been awarded to him in recognition of his services as a diplomat friendly to the American cause."
